BEYOND COMMITMENTS

Women, Peace and Security in Nigeria and the Localisation of UNSCR 1325

Nigeria's twelve-year journey from policy promises to tangible institutional and social transformation under the Women, Peace and Security (WPS) agenda. It reflects WANEP-Nigeria's under the Women in Peacebuilding Network (WIPNET) conviction that genuine progress lies not in drafting new plans but in translating existing ones into measurable outcomes at national and community levels. The assessment, led by WANEP-Nigeria under its Research and Knowledge Management commitment, documents how far Nigeria has advanced in localising UN Security Council Resolution 1325 across its three tiers of governance. It also distils lessons to guide the implementation of the Third National Action Plan (NAP III, 2024–2028) and contribute to ECOWAS's and the African Union's broader regional reviews marking twenty-five years of the global WPS agenda.

National Action Plans on Women, Peace, and Security in Nigeria

1	NAP I (2013–2017) Introduced WPS pillars and national structures
2	NAP II (2017–2020) Expanded to include CVE, reintegration, and gender training
3	NAP III (2024–2028) Institutionalizes peace structures, gender budgeting, and data tracking

First National Action Plan (NAP I) – 2013–2016

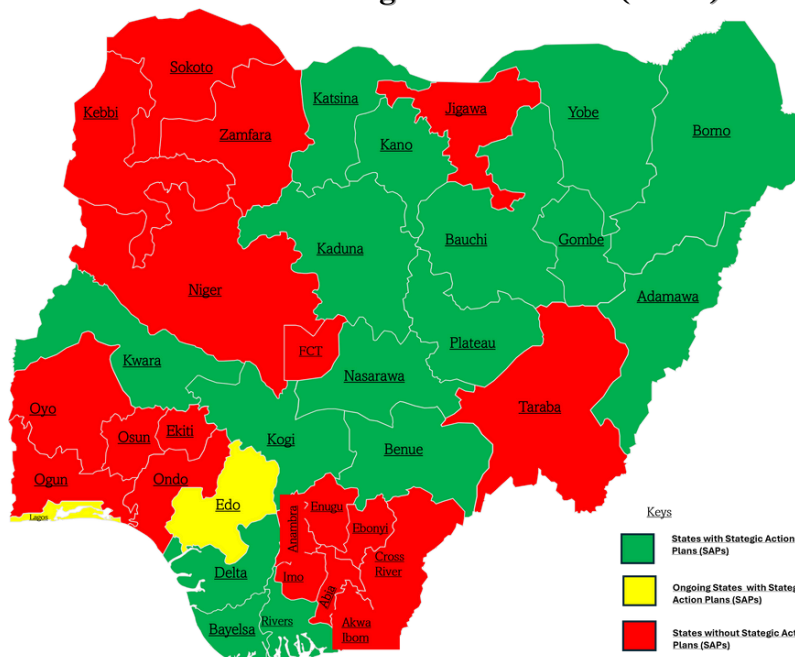

Second & Third National Action Plan (NAP II) – (2017–2020) & (2024–2028)

Nigeria's three NAPs on UNSCR 1325 move from laying the foundation, to strengthening structures, to pushing for accountability and real inclusion. Each phase deepens participation, protection, and localisation, showing a shift from broad commitment to more practical, community-level action for women in peace and security.

States with Strategic Action Plans (SAPs)

TRACKING LOCALISATION - STATE ACTION PLANS

Adoption Rate

Cross-Cutting Barriers and Emerging Lessons

- Unpredictable Financing: WPS budgets rarely exceed 2 percent of total capital spending, and most State Action Plans rely on donor grants.
- Weak Coordination: Overlapping mandates among MDAs limit coherence between national and sub-national frameworks.
- Incomplete Inclusion: Youth, displaced persons, and women with disabilities remain marginalised in participation and recovery processes.

KEY FINDINGS BY PILLAR

PILLAR 1: PREVENTION

Findings

Since 2013, reporting of women's and girls' rights violations has surged through the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) and gender desks across security agencies. NHRC complaints rose from 31,487 (2014) to over 2.3 million (2022), with nearly 800,000 cases involving women and girls in 2021 alone. Gender perspectives are now embedded in national frameworks such as the National Security Strategy and Policy Framework on PCVE.

Progress

Security institutions have established gender desks and SGBV units, women now hold command roles in the Police and Immigration Services, and states like Gombe have developed community-based IDP reintegration models that cut SGBV risk. NAP III (2024–2028) builds on this by proposing a national WPS data tracker and linking early-warning systems with gender-sensitive indicators.

Gaps

Despite record-high reporting, investigations remain below 1%, and conviction follow-through is minimal. Prevention is still reactive, not survivor-centred. Data are inconsistently disaggregated, and most protection services in conflict zones remain donor-driven. Sustained prevention will require domestic funding for data systems, standardised SGBV protocols, and institutionalised early-warning mechanisms.

Pillar 2: Participation

Findings

Women constitute 47.5 % of registered voters but under 10 % of political candidates. Female candidacy dropped from 15 % (2015) to 9 % (2023). Representation in the National Assembly remains below 10 %, far from the AU parity target. However, women's visibility in security and peace institutions has expanded, and female officers now occupy high-level positions such as Force Secretary (2024) and Comptroller-General of Immigration (2024).

Gaps

Women's inclusion remains largely informal and tokenistic in national peace negotiations. Economic and political gatekeeping, monetised primaries, violence, patriarchal norms- continue to bar women's advancement. There is still no legislated gender quota or reserved-seats law, meaning participation gains under NAP I & II risk stagnating under NAP III without structural reform.

Progress

Women serve as Commissioners and Permanent Secretaries in State Peace Commissions in Plateau, Kaduna, Benue, and Adamawa. Across communities, women mediate land disputes, prevent radicalisation, and lead local peace committees, reflecting genuine localisation of UNSCR 1325. Nigeria also exceeds UN targets in peacekeeping, with 27.9 % women personnel.

PILLAR 3 – PROTECTION

Findings

Nigeria's Violence Against Persons (Prohibition) Act 2015 is a milestone, now domesticated in 35 states. The country has also expanded Sexual Assault Referral Centres (SARCs) to states, offering clinical and psychosocial support to survivors. Gender desks and specialised units within the Police, NSCDC, and Army have improved survivor-sensitive response.

Progress

Women now occupy top justice-sector positions, including a female Chief Justice of Nigeria (2024), and represent 25–33 % of appellate judges. Training and awareness programmes on SGBV have scaled across MDAs, and NAP III proposes a National WPS Data Tracker linking SGBV cases from police to prosecution.

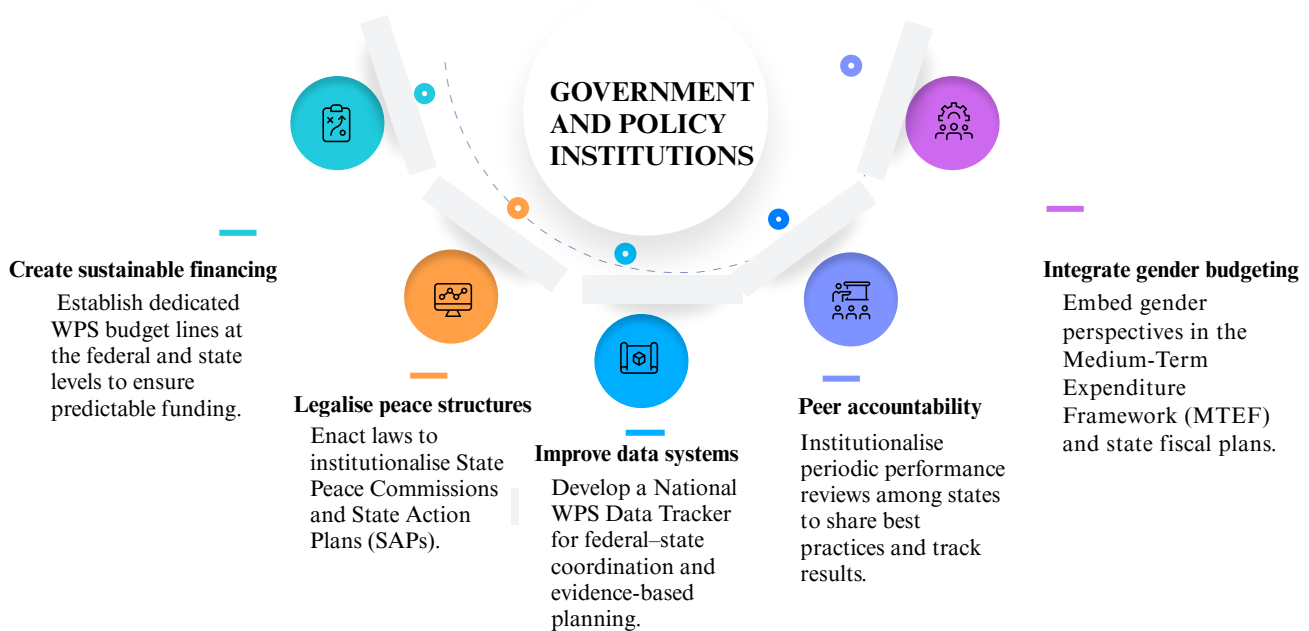

Gaps

Despite legal strength, conviction rates for SGBV remain below 2 %. Enforcement is uneven across states; some prosecutors still rely on outdated penal codes instead of the VAPP Act. Many SARCs face under-funding and staff shortages, and there is limited coordination between justice, health, and social-welfare actors. The next phase must focus on institutionalizing SARC funding, enforcing VAPP uniformly, and creating survivor-centred justice pathways under NAP III.

Gaps

Recovery remains donor-dependent, with limited domestic financing and weak monitoring. Many interventions lack sustainability beyond project cycles. To move forward, NAP III calls for dedicated national and state budget lines, integration of gender budgeting, and inclusion of women in DDR and climate-security planning to make recovery enduring and equitable.

Deepen engagement with youth, displaced persons, and women with disabilities in peacebuilding initiatives.

Include gender indicators in national media scorecards and performance monitoring frameworks.

Nigeria's twelve-year journey under the Women, Peace and Security agenda has moved from policy promises to measurable institutional change. The next phase demands bold commitment: embedding WPS within laws, budgets, and national data systems. By strengthening accountability and ensuring that no woman is left out, from the corridors of power to communities recovering from conflict, Nigeria can truly go beyond commitments toward sustainable peace and gender equality.
